Abstract

Coping with Life Events through Possible Selves

by

Michelle L. Barreto

The purpose of this thesis was to explore the ways in which a stressful life event incorporates into the sense of self. This research supports the notion that individuals are producers of their own development by exploring the individualized use of possible selves towards coping with life events. Through possible selves, the role of the self in coping with a stressful life event was examined. Specifically, the purpose of this study was to determine what types of life events and experiences become integrated into the self-system in the form of possible selves, how those life events and experiences shape one's possible selves, and whether the integration of life events and experiences is positive for developmental and psychosocial outcomes such as coping and well-being.

A total of 198 participants between the ages of 18 and 84 were included in this study (mean age was 43.78; 48.5% male, 51.5% female; 53.5% Hispanic, 27.3% White). The majority of the sample had some degree of integration of a stressful life event into their possible selves repertoire ($n = 151$).

The most common life events to be integrated into the possible selves repertoire were within the domains of family, bereavement, and lifestyle. The most significant life event to be integrated into the possible selves repertoire was the death of a parent (8.6%). Integrated life events were found to be, on average, more stressful than those that were not integrated: $t(65.6) = 2.675, p = .009$. As expected, coping scores were found to be higher for those with integrated selves: $t(51) = 2.502, p = .016$. This result indicates that more effective coping behaviors are associated with integrated selves.

Findings suggest that stressful life events that are integrated into the possible selves repertoire promote effective coping behavior. Findings indicate pathways for promoting better adaptation to life transitions in adulthood.
